

Dr. Amy Freedman, Political Science (NYC) and Dr. Joseph Lee, History (NYC)
Dyson College of Arts and Sciences

Empire Competition: Southeast Asia as a site of Imperial Contestation

The funds will be used for a completion of book conference proceedings. We received funding from the Luce-supported New York Southeast Asia Network to host a virtual international conference at Pace University in April 2021. The conference brings together a group of leading experts from around the world to examine Southeast Asia's position being in the shadow of the United States and empires from the past to the present? In for China, or Western countries? How have ethnic Chinese communities in the region been tied to, and shaped by, larger political, social and economic trends at home? How did these similarities and differences of interactions between Chinese diaspora and various Chinese regimes vary across different periods of rule (CCP, KMT, and Qing)? How did these historic relations change under European colonial rule, Japanese military occupation, and post-independent movements? And how is Southeast Asia today addressing great power rivalries between the US and China over the control of maritime space especially groups of resource-rich islands and the exercise of maritime jurisdiction related to disputes taking place in international waters?